

Paul Cox
Back to Origin Dream

2003

In the dream I was in the desert in Nevada. I was on a train going way out into the desert, to nowhere, and I had to get back to the city that was on the border of California and Nevada. The city was called Delta. I was on the train but I could not get back because I realized there was a canyon on the right side of the train. No matter what I would do I could not get over the canyon to get back to Delta. So, at the first stop I found myself at a beautiful hotel surrounded by beautiful scenery, but the train wasn't going back so I was stuck. Even though the hotel was beautiful I was frustrated because I could not get back to Delta. As the train stopped at the hotel, I noticed the train was filled with lots of baggage. I believe this baggage is all the issues that each of us have from our past. The next stop was a trailer park in the desert and there were all sorts of people there and it was terrible. I was now further out into the desert, literally at "nowhere." I thought, "How am I going to get back to Delta?" The next night I woke up and heard XYZ axis. The next day I called a friend who is knowledgeable about math. I told him about my dream and hearing XYZ axis and asked, How do I get back to Delta and what does XYZ axis have to do with all of this? Somehow I knew that the train was on the Z axis and I needed to get to Delta which was on the Y axis. You have to understand, I have been through math and I passed it and I am finished with it, praise God. But I don't understand any of this stuff. I told my friend about the XYZ axis and that I thought my train trip in the dream was the Z axis. I needed to get to Delta. How can I get there? He answered, "Paul, on an X Y Z axis, the point where the three come together is called the origin and you have to go back to the origin to get to Delta." This is so good—I don't understand any of this but it is good.
